In the ecumenical conversation on war and peace, the voice of Orthodox Christianity has too often gone underrepresented. Alexander Webster helps fill this gap, arguing that "a distinctive form of pacifism has endured in the quiet corners of monastic communities and individual souls."

It examines Levinas's stated views on peace from across his career, arguing Levinas should be viewed as a pacifist, albeit a highly original one, who shows that political structures are characterized by violence but reveal their origins in the radical peace of the face-to-face encounter.

Ham S?kh?n's ideas of peace are analyzed in terms of three key ideas: pacifism, non-violence and the minjung. It is argued that Ham's Christian pacifism was awakened by the QPT and it stimulated Ham's ideas of peace. It is also suggested that Ham's Quaker experience was parallel to his pacifist practice.
